Within outdoor living design, creating spaces that exhibit personal touches while at the same time never shying away from incorporating drama, complexity and an ever-present WOW factor is always a part of the plan for designer, Ryan Hughes of Ryan Hughes Design Build. A goal of wowing, but not overwhelming, allows individual preferences and personal touches to be incorporated whether via single elements, surfaces, shapes or major custom-built features. In an award-winning Hughes design, entitled Big Time, a space for quiet reflection and appreciation of original art was designed to exist alongside an active pool and outdoor entertainment area. The overall design incorporated circular references and a continuation of subtle hues found in the tiles and Travertine pavers throughout. "A personal touch was executed by visually connecting this curved patio space to the adjacent pool area via a circular window," said Hughes. "From a central elevated structure, a dramatic fire feature added an internal glow to a metallic orb original sculpture. The space was a welcome retreat offering a personal connection for the homeowner."
